Part 4: Read a study about wolves.

For questions 24 – 30, write A, B or C on your answer sheet.

Wild dogs rely on hunting to survive and they may sleep or rest as much as, or even more than, pet dogs that live on foods given by their owners. Domestic dogs show a great variety of sleep patterns, often including short periods of deep sleep for several hours.

A half-century-long study of wolves on Isle Royale, a remote island in Lake Superior, found that in the winter, the wolves would eat for hours from their hunted animal, and then rest or sleep in the snow about 30 percent of the time.

“Wolves have plenty of reasons to rest,” the study’s researchers wrote. “When wolves are active, they are really active. On a daily basis, wolves burn about 70 percent more calories compared to animals of similar size.” The researchers note that while hunting, wolves may burn 10 to 20 times more calories than they do while resting.

“When food is plentiful, wolves spend a large amount of time resting, because they can,” the study said. “When food resources are limited, wolves spend much time resting because they need to.”

Similarly, African wild dogs typically spend the whole daytime sleeping with their pack, usually in the shade or near water, and are more active in darker hours.
